Inhalants: Toxic Danger

You've talked to your teen about drug use and other risky behaviors, but you might not have discussed "huffing," "sniffing," "dusting," or "bagging." And if those terms don't ring a bell, it's time to brush up on inhalant abuse. More than a million teens used inhalants -- including household products like nail polish remover, correction fluids (white out), and bleach -- to get high last year. Most teens do not realize how dangerous inhalants can be, but statistics show that repeated exposure can lead to suffocation, brain damage, and even death. Parents, you should closely monitor these household substances to prevent abuse and irreversible health consequences.

Know the Signs

Combined with irreversible health hazards, easy accessibility in the home, and legal opportunity to buy directly out of the store, inhalants pose a serious threat to teens everywhere. Parents should be on the lookout for some of the common signs and symptoms of abuse, such as unusual breath odor or chemical odor on clothing; spots and/or sores around the mouth; nausea and/or loss of appetite; slurred or disoriented speech; or red or runny eyes or nose.

Signs of Inhalant Abuse

Parents should be aware of the following signs of an inhalant abuse problem:

- Chemical odors on breath or clothing;
- Paint or other stains on face, hands, or clothes;
- Hidden empty spray paint or solvent containers and chemical-soaked rags or clothing;
- Drunk or disoriented appearance;
- Slurred speech;
- Nausea or loss of appetite;
- Inattentiveness, lack of coordination, irritability, and depression;
- Missing household items.
